

Feedback Evaluation

I created a pitch to talk about what I will be doing for my idea for my FMP and I expanded upon what exactly the reason was for my considering to do the subject I was wanting to document, after my pitch I asked my audience for questions to get feedback on how I relayed my idea. My first quest was about my documentary was about how it links to the community and I responded to with the explaining how the show had a big impact on the viewers and how it went deeper into time loops for diehard fans, such as myself. This show is also very well-known and has gained a huge fanbase for many different meanings so I thought that I could use that to reach out to other fans who are wanting to dive deeper into the idea.

The next question talked about how I will involve other people in my documentary and I responded to that question to how I will be hosting interviews to people who has more knowledge than me to expand deeper on the idea, I will also send out questionnaires to gain more info from a wider scale. The following question was talking about who my target audience are and I responded with people who have been following the show even though it ended and I aim to expand upon time loops and explain why it is such an interesting subject and maybe gain a deeper understanding from any future viewers. I was also asked on how I would reflect on my work and I responded with creating a journal going step by step to explain how I got to my conclusion of my final product, this was followed by another question talking about my primary research and I responded with getting information from an official fandom and youtubers who dedicate their lives talking about the explanation to the theory.

In conclusion I did a bit more research and came to the realization I couldn't expand upon the subject due to insufficient amount of research so I then went with my second option of going for the mythological creature Jörmungandr since there is a wide range of research especially eligible research to Harvard reference so I had to go for plan B.
