

Want To Know How The Students Union Empowers Students Script 2

Hey everyone. My name is Ahmed Raza and welcome to Bradford College!

Today we're going to explore a space at the heart of student life — an environment where people from all backgrounds come together not just to study, but to connect, build friendships, share experiences, and support one another. It's a space that encourages creativity, confidence, and collaboration, and it plays a major part in shaping what your college experience will feel like outside the classroom. It's where students can socialise, take part in meaningful projects, develop their voice, and find their place in a welcoming community. That space is the Students' Union.

The Students' Union is based in the David Hockney Building, right at the heart of the campus.

You might have seen it or heard about it, but it's much more than just a space or a service.

It's a place where students are supported, where their voices are heard, and where real change can begin.

Whether you're looking for advice, joining activities, attending events, or getting involved in campaigns, the Students' Union is here to help you make the most of your time at college.

Today I'll be showing you how the Students' Union empowers students and why it plays such an important role at Bradford College.

Let's get started.

The Students' Union at Bradford College is led by students, for students.

It works independently, always making sure that the student community is listened to and supported.

Inside the Students' Union, students can find academic advice, join activities, get involved in volunteering opportunities, and take part in campaigns that lead to real change.

It's a place where students build friendships, discover new passions, and develop skills for life.

The Students' Union plays a major role in college life.

It's here to support students when they need help and to create opportunities for students who want to get involved and make a difference.

I decided to interview some of the elected candidates to hear their ideas and find out what they hope to bring to the Students' Union.

First, I spoke with Shazia Ditta, who is the Education and Welfare Officer for Higher Education.

Next, I interviewed Maqadas Bashir, the current Student Union President and Student Governor at Bradford College.

To understand more about what it means to lead the Students' Union, I also interviewed Amer Zaman, who is actively involved in student representation and leadership.

After that, I spoke with Muhammad Saad, the Education and Welfare Officer for Further Education.

There are also students across the college who are deeply involved in the Students' Union and its events.

One of them is Zain Ahmed, the Personal Development Officer at Bradford College Students' Union.

Zain has been active in supporting students and helping deliver union-led projects and events.

To hear more from his perspective, I spoke with him about his involvement and experiences.

The Students' Union isn't just about leadership.

It's about the everyday support it provides, the activities it organises, and the campaigns that make a difference to students across the college.

I also wanted to hear from students directly about their experiences with the Students' Union.

The Students' Union is a part of everything that makes college life better — offering advice, organising activities and events, and giving students the chance to make their voice heard.

The Students' Union is built by students, for students.

It's a place where every student matters, where support is always there, and where real opportunities are created.

Thank you for joining me today.

I hope you now have a better understanding of how the Students' Union empowers students here at Bradford College.

Get involved, take part, and help make a difference.

Good luck on your journey here at Bradford College.
